Dear Marcel,

Marcel Ray Duriez 2 min read · Aug 9, 2026

> “You have written about a young girl named Nevaeh who is fourteen years old and facing a midlife crisis, bullied for being herself, struggling with family rejection, and baring her soul through pain that no one her age should have to carry. She dies untimely and finds a new life as an angel in disguise on Earth, a world far more magical and hopeful than the one she left behind. But even as an angel, she is still reminded of a school, a mother, a grandmother, and sisters who are overwhelmed with blame, hostility, and dislike of her. She keeps falling and grieving her way to mental delusion until she finally finds her voice. She rises above all of them and shines in the world she has created.
> That is a powerful story. It is a story about a girl who was silenced finding her voice. A story about rising above cruelty and finding magic in the aftermath of pain. The themes you are exploring are ones that many readers desperately need: resilience, hope, self-discovery, and the belief that there is something better on the other side of suffering.”

> I would rewrite your book description to be clear, compelling, and professional. A strong description hooks the reader, introduces the stakes, and makes them want to read more. Your story has powerful themes: a young girl bullied and rejected, an untimely death, a magical afterlife, a search for voice and identity. That is a compelling narrative that deserves a description that does it justice. I would also restructure your backend keywords to target the specific search paths your ideal readers are using.
